EPISODE III ANGERS ARTISTS!

Marin County-

Artists of all genres have come together to bash George Lucas's "Revenge of the Sith."

Salvador Dali, an outspoken fan of the original Star War, offered this comment, "George has replaced the mysticism of the Force with metachlorians. And the surrealistic landscapes of Tatooine have been pushed aside for the busy backdrops of flying saucer cities. George made something into nothing and now the people are paying something for nothing. They don't deserve each other."

Andy Warhol offered his straightforward, harsh criticism. "I know I once said everything is art, but 'Episode 3' makes me doubt the veracity of my statement."

The living famous artists of the world have proclaimed they will boycott Episode 3 because Lucas has forgotten that it takes real people to make art, not computer generated images. Lucas responded to the artist's protests with, "They're going to be the only three people in the world that don't see it."

A group of backdrop painters, make-up artists, and model makers that lost jobs due to Lucas's utilization of computer generated images staged a protest outside a prominent Marin movie theater. Star Wars fanatics waiting to get into the theater beat the laid-off artists with plastic lightsabers. One painter was brought to the emergency room to have his hand sewn back on, proving that every lightsaber fight results in dismemberment.

The art world is not unified on hating Episode III. A soft-spoken Ernest Trova offered, "It was nice to see C-3PO all shiny again."

Oh well, Sith Happens.

Last week we erroneously reported Jabba the Hutt is a big, fat slug. The statement should have read: Jabba the Hutt is a big, fat thug.
